Bryans Road residents crowded a meeting room Saturday morning at the Potomac Branch Library in Indian Head to discuss improvements for the community.

The Collaborative Community Improvement Project is a pilot program designed to promote dialogue and collaboration between the Charles County commissioners, county government departments and community members.

“We have been in the dark for so long,” Tammi Crank, a Bryans Road resident, said. “That has [cost] us a lot as far as the connection.”

Bryans Road and the Indian Head area at large was chosen first because the county government heard a lot of feedback from residents, Dorea Fleisher, the community engagement coordinator for Charles County, said.

“We wanted the pilot program to be in a community where we knew we could actually get people together,” Fleisher said.

The project is estimated to cost $500,000, Estid Reedy, budget analyst at Charles County, said. The minimum cost of whatever gets built or designed must be at least $15,000 and must last at least 10 years.

“This project will really emphasize the importance and significance of our citizens participating in the ultimate success of this project,” Commissioner President Reuben B. Collins II (D) said during the meeting.

Some considerations for improvement for Bryans Road include making places feel more like a community and creating a rail-trail connection in the area, Markus Tarjamo, a planner at county government, said.

“[We’re] trying to chart forward the path with Bryans Roads residents as well as the rest of Charles County residents,” Tarjamo said.

In addition to Saturday’s meeting, community members could also attend a virtual meeting on Aug. 28 from 6-8 p.m.

A project survey is open for Bryans Road community until Sept. 15 at charles-county-md.civilspace.io/en/projects/collaborative-community-improvement-project-bryans-road.

The county hopes the project will be finalized and implemented by the end of the year. A final report of the project will be presented to the community in December 2026.
